IT'S THE ELECTRICITY NOBODY USES THAT COSTS THE MOST TO MAKE.

In the hot summer months, when air conditioning's the thing, everybody uses electricity. So much that it takes almost every piece of generating equipment we have to keep up with your demand.

Which is fine.

But when winter comes, the power demand drops. To a point about 17% lower than the summer demand. This means that a lot of our equipment winds up sitting idle.

Which isn't so fine.

Because we still have all that equipment to pay for and maintain. But it's not producing any electricity. And it's not earning its keep.

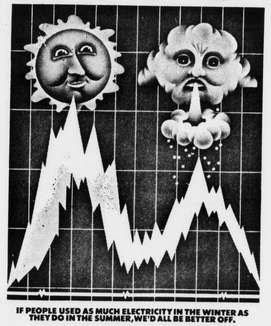
Which is bad.

The money to pay for all that equipment has to come from somewhere. And the only place we can get it is from the rate we charge you.

Which is unpopular.

Now, here's the kicker. What we need to do to solve this problem is sell more electric power in the winter months. It won't take any more plants or generators. We have them available already.

What it will do is put this equipment to work. Producing electricity to help pay for itself. And the simple fact is that the more electricity we sell in the winter, the less it costs to produce it per kilowatt-hour on a year-round basis. And that helps keep rates down.



IF PEOPLE USED AS MUCH ELECTRICITY IN THE WINTER AS THEY DO IN THE SUMMER, WE'D ALL BE BETTER OFF.

Here's the reason. Idle equipment costs you money. But when it's working and producing electricity, it's also producing money.

So it makes sense to promote the use of electricity in winter and put that equipment to work year-round That way, we keep our supply and demand in better balance.

And that helps us keep electric power a bargain buy for you.

Which is great.
